spring morning on girl with a fair, girl with a lair, sweet face, and soft, hazel eyes, whose long, dark lashes only partly veiled their ten-der light, and a veiled their ten-der light, and a mass of dark hair flowing loosely over her shoulders from beneath a broad-brimmed sun-hat. Her pretty blue dress became her graceful figure. Altogether Nora Neville was worth looking at as she stood beside the glossy black pony, her little hand lightly caressing its dainty head. Belle-the ponyhad just been purchased and presented to Nora by her indulgent father. Near by stood Frank Barrett, a handsome young stranger, who had been for a few weeks employed upon the Neville farm. It was his first experience as a farmer, but he was fast becoming proficient, and the outdoor exercise was rapidly giving him health and strength.

"Isn't she a beauty?" she persisted. 'Trank! I really believe you do not like my pet. You have not spoken one word of praise."

"Miss Nora, I'll tell you the truth." he said, slowly. "I don't like the looks of Belle. There is a lurking devil in her eyes; I am afraid she is hardly safe. You must let me break her in more before you ride her!"

"I won't!" and Nora brought her dainty little foot down firmly. "I can ride any horse for miles around here. And I don't believe a word you say about Belle. See how gentle she is! It's a shame to say such things, just to annoy me! It is not very manly to take the course you do toward me! I think you are a-" She paused a moment, as if for second thought-but it was too late-the angry words were upon her tongue-"a coward! I believe you are afraid to ride this gentle pony!" Frank Barrett's handsome face flushed crimson. He started as if he had been struck-an involuntary exclamation escaped his lips, but he turned quickly, that the willful Nora might not see how deeply her taunts had hurt him.

Somewhat ashamed of her own petulence, Nora turned hastily away, and a little later her graceful figure had entered the long, low farm-house. Frank Barrett watched her until she was out of sight

"Hulloa there!" A hoarse shout fell upon the silence and a man, mounted upon a big white horse, covered with gaudy trappings, and with much jingling of spurs, suddenly appeared upon the scene. A stranger to Frank Barrett, who turned coolly about and faced the intruder. A dark, bearded face, with hard black eyes, and a devil-may-care expression. A broad-brimmed sombrero was pulled well down over his brows; his eyes were shifty and did not meet the frank gaze of the young farmhand.

"Have you seen anything of a black pony around here?" the stranger inquired.eagerly-"a pretty little mare, with a white star on her forehead. By Jove!" turning with a start, "there she is, over yonder!"

"I think you are mistaken," rebelongs to Tom Neville. I imagine approaching party, one of the men you've heard of him? He bought the horse this morning, as a gift to his daughter."

speak of her in that insulting manner. I give you three minutes to get out of my sight, or it will be the worse for you! Go!"

The man seemed quite cowed. He sat meekly in the saddle, and, turning his horse's head in an opposite direction, rode swiftly away. A few rods distant, he turned and glanced back. In his eyes an evil expression was turking-he looked dangerous.
"I am going," he said in a low tone, but Frank caught every word that he spoke. "But I intend to pay you back for this-whoever you are-if I die in the attempt."

"Papa! What do you think? Belle is gone! I'm afraid she has been stolen. Oh, what shall I do?"

"Gone! Belle gone? Why, Nora, that's out of the question. She was locked in the stable last night. Nobody has access to the key but myself and-yes-Frank! Go ask Frank about your pony. He may have taken her out to exercise her. She's a dainty bit of horseflesh, and well worth the three hundred and fifty I paid for

"But papa, I can't find Frank! Nobody has seen him this morning. Oh, dear! I'm afraid that something has happened!"

Frank not here? Why, where can he be, I wonder? Nora, I didn't like to say anything about it before, but I received an anonymous letter, yesterday evening, warning me against this Frank Barrett. You know he is a stranger to us, after all! The letter adds: 'Watch your stable well, for Barrett is a horse-thief! You know, Nora, how a horse-thief is considered here in Texas."

"The same as a murderer!" she answered, dejectedly, "and they string up a horse-thief just as though he had taken a human life. That very day, Mr. Jasper Darke rode over to the Neville farm-house, with the intelligence that the horse, Belle, was really his own property, but had been stolen from him and sold to Mr. Neville. "They say," went on Darke, eagerly, "that the thief is caught, however-the man who stole Belle from you, Neville. Shall we ride over to Laredo? The thief is thereor near there, I am told." "With pleasure," returned Tom

> Near the Neville farm, they overtook an elderly man, riding leisurely along. At sight of Neville he reined in his steed with a courtly bow.

> "I am Judge Strong, from Dallas," he said, courteously. "I am looking for a young man named Barrett-Frank Barrett." "So are we!" interposed Neville, > sternly. Then he related the story. Judge Strong's face grew grave. Then "I think you are mistaken," he returned, quietly. "However, we will "Defend yourself, Frank!" she cried bravely. "I know you are innocentoh, my love!"

For all at once, the truth had come home to her heart, and she knew that she loved him, dearly, devotedly. But [First published August 17, 1894, in the official Judge Strong came to the rescue. "Gentleman," he cried in a commanding voice, "You are not aware that this young man-Frank Barrett work in the fields to regain his lost health. His father has grown weary of waiting for him to come home, and sent me after him. Touch him at your peril!"

Of course it was all settled. As they rode on slowly back to the Neville farm-house, Frank explained for I'm a neighbor of his. My name is that he had taken Belle from the Darke-Jasper Darke. As for Neville's stable, intending to break her and daughter, she's the prettiest girl in train her, so that she would be safer the county, and when I take the for Nora to ride.
